Bone defects induced by major trauma or bone disease may be managed by autografts, allografts, or synthetic biomaterials. Most synthetic materials are unable to provide a biological environment adequate for the repair of a bone defect. The development of new synthetic biomaterials that can effectively support the repair of bone defects is therefore the subject of intense research. Here, we present the first direct comparison of the repairing capability of an acrylate-based gel, containing a bone morphogenetic protein (BMP) and 2-hydroxyethyl methacrylate, with a bone autograft in a critical-size calvarial defect model. Six New Zealand rabbits were used in this study and each animal received a calvarial defect of 5 mm diameter. Subperiosteal dissection was performed from the medial calvaria of rabbits, and autogenous bone was harvested and harvested and concentrated at the center of the defect area and then implanted to the defect. The gel was injected into the grafted defect with a syringe, and the defects were covered with a sheet of 2-0 Vicryl suture. After 4 weeks, both defect areas were removed and prepared for histological evaluation using hematoxylin and eosin staining, and then the expression of bone morphogenetic protein-2 and type I and type II collagen was confirmed.
